I need fix by any way. As you see, this zip file looks like a valid one. But when I uploaded this file to web, it shows the following message from Cloudflare browser. The provided URL appears to be safe, but the files it refers to are not safe. Sometimes this DNS attack attempt failed to work to me, but I am worried that someone intentionally cracked this file and uploaded it to my website. Is there any way to protect my website from this kind of attack? Should I not allow user upload this file to my website? Any advice or suggestion will be appreciated. Thanks. A I am a Python developer and I use a Flask using with the zip file and it's SHA-1 hash. It has an empty etag, which will make it go into a "This file has been updated in the last X minutes" loop. This is the kind of thing that is used to make people believe that their site is down when it's actually up. There's no Content-Type: plaintext, which means that, when it's downloaded with Content-Disposition: inline, it will treat it like HTML. The etag is different from the hash. If you curl it, you'll get an HTTP/1.1 200 OK header with etag: "16f50b0c071118677b103684142000f" and a header section with a "no-cache" header from Cloudflare with hash: "02_20_04_24_02_11_14_04_06_30_00_01_01_01_01" and status: "204 Not Modified". Putting the right ETag in this format instead of the hash will break the Cloudflare caching system. Compare with the curl -i output for the download from the zip file. The file is not named correctly. The file name is "Flow3d_V10_Crack_12.zip". As mentioned, the file is missing the "no-cache" header. It's missing the Content-Type, and it's missing an embedded ETag. Because of these things, the server will treat the zip file as HTML.
