.. I don't know, I can't think of a way it could be done. The amount of people who actually really do want to program is small. Most people, if they have access to a computer, they can pretty much do what they want to. I have tried, but I have not been successful. As you probably realized, this isn't a question about "why is this code ugly/sloppy/bad?" It's a question about the logic behind the code, and "why does this work?" A: You could have it either generated dynamically by the querystring and then passed to a function, or create an object with the event handler on it and then invoke it. `$("#checkbox").click(function() { var username = $("input[name=name]").val(); var firstname = $("input[name=firstname]").val(); var lastname = $("input[name=lastname]").val(); var homehone = $("input[name=homehone]").val(); var mobilephone = $("input[name=mobilephone]").val(); var address = $("input[name=address]").val(); var address_2 = $("input[name=address_2]").val(); var street_1 = $("input[name=street_1]").val(); var street_2 = $("input[name=street_2]").val(); var city = $("input[name=city]").val(); var zipcode = $("input[name=zipcode]").val(); var postal_code = $("input[name=postal_code]").val(); if (username == firstname && firstname == lastname && homehone == mobilephone && address == address_2 && street_1 == street_2 && city == zipcode && zipcode == postal_code) { alert("Please note that your address and name must be entered to complete the registration."); } else { $("register_form").submit(); } } or var check = { 82157476af`
